Perfect Sense

Outbreak meets Deep Impact

One of the most thought provoking movies I've watched this year.

What if the whole world were to lose their sense of taste, will that be the end of restaurants? Watch how the human adapt to losing one sense at a time until there is none.... Think about at the end of the world or your life, what matters most? Great performance by Ewan Macgregor and Eva Green.

This movie reminds us of all things that are taken for granted, our family, friends, work, health, love but most importantly our 5 senses. Where would you be without these? Susan and Michael are flawed individuals who have just found each other. As they get closer the world around them falls apart. In the end what they really have is love.

This movie is much more than just a love story. When people suffer strange symptoms affecting the emotions and the senses, the impact could be more horrible than they could have imagined. Featuring some incredible scenarios of human endurance, it can inspire us to think about the dramatic changing world and our lives.

I first expected an epidemic like what was seen in "28 Days later" But the syndromes in "Perfect Sense" is more humanistic that they consume each person's connection with others and their world. The loss of taste takes away the enjoyment of food. The loss of hearing blocks each person – social animal – from modes of communication we used to. The words coming from Ewan McGregor before he caught another syndrome make me think how fragile human relationship is – compared to human body.

Can you imagine the world without sense? The line up of the story talks about peoples lost their smell because of disease. Susan is a doctor who meets Michael who is a chef of a restaurant fall in love and experience sense and memory. Simple story line but it tells the misery of someone who loses a sense.
